#8 Mobile App Development

Mobile app development is the process used to create software for smartphones, tablets, and mobile devices.

The overall process includes writing code to create the software and designing the app.

App development is similar to other software development, including web apps.

But the biggest difference between app development and traditional software development is the ability for mobile apps to use native features on a device.

For example, apps can leverage mobile features like GPS, Bluetooth, a camera, a microphone, and other functions that are pre-built into a smartphone.

Apple and Android apps dominate the global market share for mobile apps.

So while it's possible to create apps for other platforms, most apps target these two markets.
